

What's Important for the Road Ahead

“ During what could be classified as possibly the most challenging times of our lives, we took stock of what is really important. Now what?”

It's time to push forward. It's time to apply lessons learned to enhance both our personal and professional lives. It's time to move on with renewed purpose.

Yes, the last 18 months have been challenging, to say the least—physically, mentally and emotionally. Collectively, our resources have been lowered, making it even harder for us to do more than simply survive. Furthermore, we're not quite out of the woods yet, with another wave of the pandemic raging on. We can't wait to live life without the restrictions of the last year. We often talk about hitting the reset button, but do we really want to go back to normal as we knew it?

Out of the many challenges we have faced while navigating the uncertainties of the pandemic and beyond, there came a shift in our perspective and maybe even our priorities. We have spent more time with our families, we have worked from home and we have missed human contact with our extended families, friends and coworkers. We have slowed down, recalibrated, gotten organized and questioned many things within our lives. The year 2020 offered an opportune time to reaffirm our core values and beliefs. During what could be classified as possibly the most challenging times of our lives, we took stock of what is really important. Now what?

“ What’s important to you is important to us.

Whether we are still struggling or recognizing we are now more resilient than ever, it is time for assessment that helps us rise above all we have experienced. What questions have we asked ourselves over the last year and continue to ask now? How have we grown? What has kept us strong? What can we do to make our work/life as balanced as we envision? What gets us out of bed each day? What keeps us up at night? How can we retool our present roles to better connect with our stakeholders, goals and missions? How do we successfully move forward while bringing joy to the workplace and renewing our personal commitment to ourselves and our organizations?

Let’s redefine our purpose and move forward with excitement, ambition and great anticipation.
